

Rod Coronado: The War to Save America's Wilderness

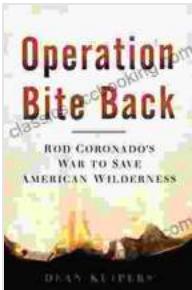

Rod Coronado is a legendary figure in the history of the American environmental movement. For over four decades, he has been fighting to protect America's wild places, from the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to the California coast. His work has helped to establish some of the nation's most iconic protected areas, including the Golden Gate National Recreation Area and the Santa Monica Mountains National Recreation Area.

Coronado's story is one of passion, determination, and unwavering commitment to the cause of conservation. He grew up in a small town in New Mexico, and from a young age, he developed a deep love of the outdoors. He spent his childhood exploring the nearby mountains and deserts, and he quickly realized the importance of protecting these wild places for future generations.

In the 1970s, Coronado joined the Sierra Club, and he quickly rose through the ranks to become one of the organization's most influential leaders. He led the Sierra Club's successful campaign to defeat a proposed dam on the Tuolumne River in California, and he played a key role in the establishment of the Golden Gate National Recreation Area. In 1982, Coronado was elected president of the Sierra Club, and he served in that role for two terms.
