Born and raised in a small town in the San Francisco Bay Area, Garcia first became interested in forestry while taking a class in college. After graduating, he joined the Forest Service and spent the next three decades working in a variety of roles, including as a district ranger, forest supervisor, and regional forester.

During his time with the Forest Service, Garcia witnessed firsthand the many challenges facing the agency, including the increasing frequency and severity of wildfires, the loss of critical habitat, and the impacts of climate change. Despite these challenges, Garcia remained committed to the Forest Service's mission of caring for the nation's forests and grasslands.

In "The Forest Service In Transition," Garcia shares his insights on the agency's history, its current challenges, and its future prospects. He argues that the Forest Service needs to adapt to the changing needs of society and to find new ways to protect and manage the nation's forests and grasslands.

Garcia's memoir is a valuable resource for anyone interested in the Forest Service, forestry, or conservation. It is a must-read for anyone who wants to understand the challenges facing the Forest Service and the agency's role in the future of conservation.
